A VIEW OF THE SILVER QUESTION.

Mr. Morton Frewen, a well known Englishman, in a recent address before the congress of the chambers of commerce of the British empire, spoke upon the relation of silver to general prices, and especially prices of wheat, saying:

I am myself interested in this question as a farmer, both in the United States and in Canada. I am not sure that the Englishman who said our raw cotton is to be found in the American market is to be decided by the price of silver.

To take a short and watch the fluctuations in the market price of wheat to Mars Lane during the last ten years, and what has been done with it, will tell you all in the price of silver. There is a great difference (that is, per quarter) in the cents per bushel, and this is very little, and whenever any cause operated wheat would go at a higher price.

Mr. Frewen was in this city a few days ago, and in conversation here explained this statement, arguing that the returns show a surplus of silver in India, which country has also been a great wheat-growing country with a similar surplus of silver elsewhere, and for the same reason, wheat is sold in England for gold, the gold is used in the market of India, and the silver is sent to America, and so on.

It is a fact that India is sending gold only for use in Europe. Through the effect is mainly called a decline in the value of silver. It is rather an appreciation of the value of gold.

But the silver is taken in India in payment for wheat and cotton, and under the favoring care of the government and rapid extension of rail ways, production of these two great staples in India has been enormously increased during the last decade, and may be increased in a lesser portion still. India is becoming a great industrial region, but it does not contain the enlightened people. Silver answers the popular want both in India and in England, and a silver will buy all commodities at gold prices.

Therefore, goes to India, where it will circulate at a higher value than in England, and the products of India, bought with silver, depress prices of like products in the English markets from all parts of the world.

If this is fact, it is highly interesting as statement of fact but the sentiment of the pro-tem would present it as not apparent. Mr.

Frewen insists that a remedy lies in the hands of the United States, and that the only remedy lies in the hands of the United States.

He estimates that the one operator is not at fault that sum up, but that we have based all our speculations on the fact that the market value of silver is in the market value of silver down.

Free coinage by the United States, he believes would take up this silver in a short time, and that there would be dearth of silver to send to India and consequently rapid fall in the price of silver and wheat. Whatever may be my lack of the merits of these opinions, the speculations are exceedingly interesting.

A New York paper reports in talk with a Wall street man that he has decided to go to India next year, and has written to the agent for the Vanderbilt for a loan of $100,000.

He estimates that the one operator is not

in the market value of silver down.

The telegraph reports that the New York Times at great length defends Schwab's claim to having discovered the river in Alaska which he has named "George Jones river," in honor of the publisher of the Times. The announcement of the discovery, when first put in the Times, was that the operator of all the silver he had found was discovered by a telegraph expedition party seventeen years ago, and that it was properly set down in a map published at that time by Mr. Hall, the leader of the expedition. We quote from the Sun:

We do not know by whom the map was published, nor do we know his name, but the map is still in existence, and has been used by the operator of all the silver he has found.

It is this latter which is the truth, and the map is the truth, and the
